Course description: This course explores LGBTQ political movements and related public policies in the United States, and locates these within historical contexts and with reference to theories about gender and sexuality. The importance of intersecting identity categories such as race, class, sex, gender, sexual orientation, and gender identity will be explored as they impact political mobilization and public policy strategies and impacts of the movement. We will also look to the specific context of LGBTQ life and politics in Newark, and use the resources of the Queer Newark Oral History Project, including hearing from researchers who have worked with this resource, working with the oral histories, and hopefully hearing from some of those who are part of the oral history project.

Some of the questions that we will discuss might include: What role should the state play in regulating the relation between sexual identity and expression? What is at stake in the debates over same-sex marriage and the claims by sexual minorities for equal rights? How have responses to the LGBTQ movement, including anti-gay political organizing, affected the political landscape and the strategies of the movement? Given the many intersecting aspects of LGBTQ movement activists identities, how and in what ways have the different strands of the LGBTQ movement interacted in making public claims? How and by what means is it possible for sexual minorities to become full participants in democratic citizenship? How is the US context for LGBTQ activism unique, and how is it similar to other national political contexts?

At the ballot box, in Congress and state legislatures, through protests and in the courts, gay, lesbian, bisexual, intersex, transgender, and queer people are seeking recognition and asserting claims to rights and protections under law. LGBTQ issues – such as non-discrimination laws, the prevention of hate crimes, access to marriage, access to public facilities on an equal basis – have become prominent in mainstream political debates. Yet progress has also been met by backlash, and the struggle for access to equality in public and private life continues.

Specific Learning Outcomes

- Students will understand the history of LGBTQ political mobilization in the U.S. and the background for current claims for changes in public policy.
- Students will examine specific political claims of the LGBTQ movement, and the use of different strategies such as appeal to courts, legislatures, executive agencies, and public opinion in making these claims.
- Students will become familiar with the oral histories and other materials of the Queer Newark Oral History project, and will learn how to analyze materials from the archive.
- Students will understand intersectionality and its centrality to the kinds of claims made by activists in the LGBTQ movement as well as to some of the movement's disagreements over strategies, norms, values, citizenship, and inclusion.

- Students will develop their skills in analyzing oral histories and other materials in the QNOHP archive, and over the course of the semester will prepare research notes, field notes, analysis, and a final paper that will integrate analysis of a specific oral history with the concepts learned in course readings and lectures.

Required Assignments and Grading

- | | |
|--|-----|
| • Reading Comprehension Quizzes: Four (out of six opportunities) | 25% |
| • Research and Field Notes from speakers and films (at least 6) | 25% |
| • Final Paper (Proposal, Research notes, Draft, Presentation, Final) | 40% |
| • Class Attendance and Participation | 10% |

RESEARCH AND FIELD NOTES: We will be watching a number of films in this class, and will have guest speakers. We will also do one field trip to the Newark Public Library, and will be using the QNOHP oral histories. For all of these, you will take research/field notes. You will be provided with a basic format for doing this, and will hand those in at the end of class for each of these activities.

FINAL PAPER: You will write a research paper for this class, and will do so in stages: you will write a short proposal, indicating which of the oral histories from QNOHP you plan to use and why; you will provide research notes based on your work with the oral history that you have chosen, you will write a draft paper on which I will give you feedback, you will give a brief class presentation on your project, and you will write a final paper.

QUIZZES: At the beginning of class, I will give a short quiz that is intended to assess your basic comprehension of the reading for that class day. There will be at least six quizzes during the semester, and your final grade will include your top four scores on these quizzes. The quizzes are intended to provide you with an incentive to actually read the course materials ahead of class. In general quizzes will consist of 8 to 10 questions of the short answer, multiple choice, or true/false variety though some quizzes may include slightly longer answers (e.g. in one sentence summarize the main point of this article).
